

HANDWRITING REVELATIONS

by Don Marlette

WHAT IS GRAPHOLOGY?

Graphology is the study and analysis of handwriting. Handwriting is unique to each person, and so is his or her personality. It would follow, then, that handwriting would be able to tell us a great deal about the writer's personality traits, personal history, and perhaps even a bit about his or her future.

Many divination systems depend upon cards, such as the Tarot, or even body characteristics, such as phrenology or palmistry. However, graphology depends upon someone's writing sample, as well as the writer's signature. When properly analyzed, one's handwriting can be an incredible key to the writer's self-understanding, past and present situations, as well as hints concerning the writer's future path.

The key to graphology is its use of the human mind's ability to unconsciously control the actions of the body. Just as the act of chewing triggers an unconscious operation of the tongue and teeth, one's handwriting is only partially controlled by the writer. Hidden beneath this seemingly innocent activity, the mind is also supplying a system of symbols that, unknown to the writer, communicate a number of personality traits and clues to other parts of the writer's life.

There are numerous tomes, courses, and websites available that will connect you to the many facets of this continually evolving study. Instead, I will give you a very broad outline of handwriting analysis, and its import not only for understanding one's personality, but also as a key to unlocking one's own intuition about the future, given the right reader.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF HANDWRITING

To begin with, let's talk about the definition of Graphology and its meaning through the ages. In truth, graphology began with one mark: the handprint. If you go to indigenous cultures (native cultures) you will find that the handprint was often understood in much the same way that we understand signatures today. Each handprint was unique in size and shape, with particular features such as finger length, hand breadth, and even pressure of the handprint. These basic features were what was recognized by early cultures in distinguishing one handprint from another.

As time pushed on, the development of writing came about, with its eventual development of signatures and individual “marks”. Of course, with the signature, particularly in the Western world, came the advent of what we know today as the fraud of forgery: the imitation of someone’s signature or mark by someone other than the original writer. Much like the primitive handprint, it was understood that each person had a particular signature with its own set of characteristics, from style and weight, to the formation of individual letters.

Enter the modern world. The science of Graphology came into existence because of an initial intuitive jump first tentatively in the sixteenth century, but boldly in the mid-nineteenth century, that signatures not only have characteristic features, but these features tell us something about the personality of the writer. This notion continues to be researched and documented, even into the present day, given the number of books and websites on the subject of graphology.
